Mr. and Mrs. Wormwood had an ordinary little boy, Michael and a daughter, Matilda. They were so busy with their unimportant business that they did not realize Matilda was clever. By the age of one and a half, she could speak perfectly and knew as many words as most grown up people. By the time she was three, Matilda could read newspapers. At the age of four she could read fast and well.

‘Daddy,’ she said. ‘Could you buy me a book?’

‘A book?’ he said. ‘What’s wrong with the TV? We’ve got a nice TV and now you come asking for a book! We’re too good to you already, my girl!’

Nearly every afternoon, Matilda stayed in the house while her brother, who was five years older than her, went to school, her father went to work and her mother went to the cinema.

One afternoon, Matilda walked to the library in the village. Mrs. Phelps, the woman at the library, was surprised to see this small girl.

‘Where are the children’s books, please?’ asked Matilda.

Mrs. Phelps showed her. ‘Shall I find you a nice one with lots of pictures in it?’ she said.

‘No, thank you. I’m sure I can find something,’ said Matilda.

From then on, every afternoon, as soon as her mother had left for bingo, Matilda would toddle down to the library and sat quietly in a corner reading.

‘What shall I read next?’ she asked Mrs. Phelps one day.

‘I’ve finished reading all the children’s books.’

‘You mean you’ve looked at the pictures.’

‘Yes, but I’ve read the books, too,’ said Matilda.

Mrs. Phelps was very surprised. ‘How old are you, Matilda?’ she asked.

‘Four years and three months.’ answered Matilda.

Mrs. Phelps was even more surprised, but she was too sensible to show it. ‘What sort of book would you like to read next?’ she asked.

A really good one, that grown - ups read’ said Matilda. ‘A famous one.’

So Mrs. Phelps gave her Great Expectations by Charles Dickens, a very famous English writer. Over the next few afternoons Mrs. Phelps could hardly take her eyes from the small girl sitting for hour after hour in the big arm chair at the far end of the room with the book on her lap.
